HIS NEW BOOK ON CIA HAS CAUSED FUROR

Some official hackles have been raised because of a new book about the CIA by veteran Washington newsman Andrew Tully. In a short note at the book's beginning, Tully thanks several prominent persons for talking with him about the secret agency. But, it's learned, he has received letters from some requesting that if new editions are printed, their names be deleted. Among them: Allen W. Dulles, the CIA's ex-Chief, and Pierre Salinger, President Kennedy's Press Secretary. Best guess for the reason: Tully has some unkind things to say about the CIA under Dulles.

The Pentagon's efforts to identify fallout shelters in existing buildings around the nation is running into unexpected trouble. When surveyors call at some places, the people have refused to let them in. "They thought we were snooping around to get information that might raise their property taxes," one surveyor lamented. "We were mistaken for revenue men, looking for moonshiners," said another.

It isn't likely to show up any forthcoming Federal Communications Commission ruling but some top FCC officials are burned up about the weatherman on TV. "I listen to those dreadful reports about the weather," said one New Frontier aide. "I am almost afraid to go outside. When I do, what do I find? A lousy inch and a half of snow!"

The New Frontiersmen plan to approach Congress a different way this year on a new farm program. "We're going to spell out as specific as possible in dollars and cents what the new program will cost," says one bigwig. "That way Congress, the farmer and the taxpayer will know what to expect. Last time we scattered our shots too much and were too vague," he adds. Expected are new programs for wheat, cotton, dairy products and feed grains.

George Cabot Lodge, son of the Republican vice-presidential nominee, is moving fast in his bid for the senatorial nomination in Massachusetts. His big head-start on rounding up a majority of votes in the June convention (1,100 delegates) is giving pause to other pos-

Democrats are doing their best to keep George W. Romney from becoming the Republican candidate for governor of Michigan. For example, Neil Staebler, Democratic National Committee man, and others have privately urged Ford Foundation officials to hasten a pending one million dollar grant to Citizens For Michigan, a non-partisan group. Romney is the moving spirit of the body which is working, among other things, to put Michigan's fiscal affairs in order. Democrats hope Romney's civic-mindedness might spur him to continue his efforts in this field instead of going into active politics if the grant comes through in time.
